THE TASK FORCE ON NATIONAL UNITY

The Task Force on Canadian Unity is the most hurried effort to date in the direction of national understanding. It comes down to a simple conclusion -- the Task Force believes that the key (and the most pressing) issue in Canada today is Anglo-French racial strife and that Trudeau has the answer to it (although it may have to be modified). In other words, this is not an impartial group. The members' presuppositions are strong, meaning they will hear some solutions more than others because they coincide with their own.

The Task Force is a government-initiated commission with the avowed intention of assem-time". In effect, to modify the system which "is the one best suited to the diversity of our founding peoples and to the nature of our geographic, social and economic environments". (N.B. All quotations in this paragraph are from a handout, "The Role of the Task Force").

It is obvious that the numbers of the Task Force have not taken to heart (or mind) neither the plurality of Canada's people, nor the policy of multiculturalism implemented by the Prime Minister in 1971. The "third option" they seek has been articulated by numerous groups (other than the French and the English) for years now. The Task Force still sees

Canadians who are non-English and non-French stand when the system is geared towards "the diversity of our two founding peoples"? Do we assimilate (and in which direction) or do we retain an independent profile? In fact, for years the former has been assumed. John Evans, president of the University of Toronto and a Task Force member, expanded on this matter saying that the French are obviously the founding nation of Canada -- who retain their homogeneity by and large -- while the English do not have the same cohesiveness. He has mistakenly equated our existence in the English speaking sector of Canada with the adoption into bling "concepts and policies which could constitute some of the elements of a third option for Canada". They are not mandated to give an overall critique of the current situation in Canada, but only to bring forth recommendations which will "make our Canadian institutions more consistent with the needs of the only bilingualism and biculturalism as the panacea for Canada's ills; the second option threatened by Quebec is secession, a rather unacceptable alternative for many. The solution, obviously is to make Confederation palatable to the French Canadians.

Where, then, do the 28% of of English mores during the process of "Canadianization" (i.e. complete assimilation). The French Canadians have also assumed that the "other peoples" because they live in the English-speaking sector of Canada, identify with Anglo cultural and political interests; hence they feel doubly threatened because the Anglos appear to be even more formidable. At the same time, the government implements a policy such as multiculturalism which specifies the French as an "ethnic group" (along with the Germans, Italians, Ukrainians, etc.) while never letting the Anglo-Celts know they are an "ethnic" minority. In Canada it is implicitly understood that "Canadian culture" is Anglo-Celtic culture (or, some people have concluded in the search for a Canadian identity or culture, the lack of it).

And at this time of stress in the federal system, does the desire of Ukrainians to retain their cultural

BRITISH STUDENTS DEFEND KLYMCHUK

Andrij Klymchuk, a British student of Ukrainian origin was arrested on August 1 of this year while on a tour of Ukraine, and charged with allegedly smuggling anti-Soviet literature, including instructions from emigre nationalist organizations, into the Soviet Union. Since that time, the Soviet authorities have intensified their campaign against "bourgeois nationalists" in the attempt to discredit the opposition by linking them with emigre nationalist organizations and foreign espionage agencies. The case of Klymchuk has received broad support in Britain due to the initiatives of the National Union of Students, the International Marxist Group and the Socialist Students' Alliance, which founded the Committee to Defend Andrij Klymchuk. The activities of these groups in defence of Klymchuk stands in contrast to the silence maintained by the emigre nationalist organizations, who have become the focus of Soviet attacks.

In October, a demonstration was staged, involving some 800 people, in defence of Klymchuk. The demonstration took place outside the Soviet Embassy in protest against Klymchuk's arrest and demanded his immediate release. The demonstration which was organized by the London Committee to Defend Andrij Klymchuk, was one of the largest did not consist of the traditional anti-Soviet slogan like "Better Dead Than Red". On the contrary, the slogan chanted included "Free Andy Klymchuk -- stop State repression" and "KGB out -- socialist democracy in". The International Marxist Group and the Socialist Students' Alliance are currently attempting to take this issue into colleges to ensure that the next NUS Conference gives the Executive a clear mandate for the defence of all political prisoners in the USSR and Eastern Europe.

The silence of liberal, conservative and right-wing groups who take up only those cases of repression from which they hope to gain political capital. By defending all cases of political repression in the USSR and Eastern Europe, groups such as the London Committee to Defend Andrij Klymchuk, who have taken the campaign forward on a clearly socialist basis, have shown that they are in the forefront in defending democratic rights and socialist democracy in these countries.

ANOTHER DOVBUSH AFFAIR?

The fact that Andrij Klymchuk's father is a former member of the nationalist "Halychyna" division, during WW II, has been used by

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Touchy resolution

During the final session of the 18th USUK Congress, a debate transpired, whose ramifications must be stressed. When delegates are involved in forming Congressional Resolutions, it is crucial that they acknowledge the group for whom the resolution is intended. Resolutions intended for external distribution must be specific, justified, and well qualified. They should not be treated as tantalizing rhetoric meant to delight Particular Congress Members. By employing satisfying phrases which are misunderstood by the ultimate intended reader, we are only succeeding in alienating those whom we would wish to convert.

The resolution which illustrated this problem dealt with the condemnation of the League for the Liberation of Ukraine's veto against Plyushch. Overall, this motion was well argued and certainly well warranted. However, in their zeal to depict the League's executive as a narrow clique that ironically aided the Soviet cause at splitting its opposition, the resolution committee overreacted and selected the phrase, "in collaboration with the K.G.B." To an informed delegate at this Congress, the implied meaning of these words was clear; that by its reconciliation attitude, the League was de facto aiding their greatest enemy. However, most non-student readers of this resolution would not see it as an outburst against the League's anti-democratic politics, but rather as an unsubstantiated attack on an organization which they have been long supported.

After ninety minutes of intense debate, the phrase was modified to read that the League was inadvertantly "playing into the hands of the K.G.B." The implicit message was now explicit. This may seem a subtle point, but when dealing with the predominantly conservative Ukrainian community we cannot be too careful. Had the resolution been passed while unamended, the message would have surely been misinterpreted. This is a critical lesson, and one which I hope will not be overlooked at subsequent Congresses.

Traditionalist Mourns Decay of Values Amongst Youth

What sours me to compose this letter is a phenomenon that surely rends the heart of every Ukrainian proud of his heritage, namely: the way our youth is neglecting the hallowed traditions of our ancestors. Perhaps STUDENT can take up the claim of a return to tradition and serve as a beacon guiding our youth back on the path trod by our forefathers. My own letter will just mention a few of the traditions so thoughtlessly scorned by our young people and will indicate some of the sources these whipper-snappers might turn to for regeneration.

I might start with the hookah or water-pipe, so popular in Cossack Ukraine during the days of Mazepa. Klymentiy Zinoviy (Virshi. Pravyoti pospolity) infers that whole villages in Ukraine did nothing but manufacture hookahs. The Cossacks learned of the hookah, which they called a berdak, from the Tatars and Turks.

Zinoviy affirms that some Cossacks "developed the habit of pulling on the hookah, through which more than one person lost his sense" (my navyk bardakom ziahanuty: prez katry ne sedomu prysloko smyslu zbutyl). Might not our youth take its cue from this? Why serve wine and cheese at Ukrainian student gatherings?

AMERICA SLAYS THE DRAGON

The following article is composed of extracts taken directly from an article entitled Young Marxists do Their Stuff which appeared in the October 20, 1977, issue of the informative Ukrainian American newspaper America.

The fact is fabulous, indeed, indeed. There is a herd core of Marxist zealots among Ukrainian students in Canada who are openly active in non-communist and even professedly anti-communist student organization. Lately, they became too vocal and ardent in critical area of the Ukrainian national community life and policy in Canada. When opposed in their endeavors to get for Leonid Plyushch invitation for appearance as a principal speaker at the Congress of the Canadian Ukrainian Committee in Winnipeg by the League for Liberation of Ukraine—a political organization which is the constituent member of the Committee, the Union of Ukrainian Students in Canada resolved at their Congress to condemn the League for Liberation of Ukraine as a "fascist" and "totalitarian" organization, having possibly ties to the KGB (organs of the state security in the USSR)...

...The members of the League for Liberation of Ukraine as non-Marxists, have the right to oppose the invitation of a Marxist as a principal speaker at the Congress of Ukrainians in Canada. Young Ukrainian Marxists may be few in numbers, but we shall always remember Leninist dogma that numbers are less important than disciplined organization. When we regard young Ukrainian Marxism in the United States and in Canada as we decidedly should—their numerical insignificance ceases to be decisive. With Chinese and Cuban forces added to the Soviet apparatus, the world Marxist enterprise is vastly larger and more powerful than at any

How much better it would be to honor tradition and pass around the hookah filled with a substance that has the proper effect on one's sense!

Many of the same young people who have abandoned the hookah are also shamelessly shaving their faces as smooth as a baby's bum and cutting their hair grotesquely short. Why do they so abhor the ways of their ancestors? Long, shaggy hair—that is our tradition. Let us think back to the very end of the sixteenth century when Ukrainians defended their Orthodox Church against the onslaught of Polish Catholicism. At that time, the monk Ivan Vyhensky celebrated in a long poem by Ivan Franko, composed his Knyzha. In the Knyzha, Vyhensky asks why Roman Catholics make fun of Ukrainian Orthodox monks. He puts these words in a Catholic's mouth: "For this reason do I make fun of the Ukrainian monk... because he wears long hair and has not shaved" (Dlja toho sia smiu, ...izh voloria dolhoie nosiy i ne podholovia). Vyhensky wisely counters this shallow reasoning with the following profound consideration: "As distant as heaven is from earth, just so distant is a shaved head from a shaggy head in thought, worthiness, dignity and honesty before God. This is why we have shaggy hair." (...iak nebo ot zemlia tak holaja holova ot kosmoloi mysliv, dostoinsym, hodnosti u chitvosti pred Bohom daleche stoit. Se test prychyna kormatoho volosia.

So let us hope that our youth takes these words to heart and that in the future we will often see our shaggy, long-haired youth gathered around the water-pipe, smoking some sense-shattering substances.

Before closing this letter, however, I might offer one more source worth consulting for a deeper understanding of our legal responsibility for their actions, and their posture as wrongdoers cannot be tolerated by the community. It must be said here that the existence of our young Marxists and tolerance of their pseudo-ideological verbiage of Marxism coupled with different Left slogans, has long been ignored by the Ukrainian community in the United States and in Canada. It is the last time to stop this practice; otherwise this type of our self-indulgence will become foolish and even suicidal. Exposing the past and current machinations of the K.G.B. agents, nobody is beating a dead horse. The animal is very much alive and gets its oats regularly from the international fodder stock...

...The "Red Decade," of course, did not end with the advent of 1940's; communist organizations and influence were carried over and have persisted, in varying degrees to this day. The present day Party-line for the West, in both the Kremlin and Maoist versions, prescribes cooperation with any radical movement, even with the formerly outlawed anarchist tendencies. Thus, the brain damage and ethical trauma have been passed along to the present-day generation...

...Extremes of violence and vandalism and pornography combine with teaching in schools and universities, with writing in avant-grade periodicals, with preaching from the pulpit to keep the world in a state of turmoil and uncertainty. The followers of Marx have been entrenched everywhere: in the government, in the schools and universities, in literature and art. All they work for Revolution: this swarming, disciplined, obedient and fanatically self-righteous army of Marxists. A generation of college youth has been poisoned by Marxist pseudoscience and amorality and has carried the disease into manifold post-collegiate activities. This is also the reason for one of the strangest lapses into utopianism which afflicted a part of the Ukrainian students.

neither courage nor convictions, but only a muddy emotionalism and a mental fog which makes them an easy prey for the political racketters...

...Our young Marxists should not be exempt from moral and traditions. I have in mind Guillaume Beauplan's Description of Ukraine. Beauplan (c. 1600-1673) was a French engineer who spent many years working in Cossack Ukraine. Among the numerous fine traditions he records, one is outstanding—"the habit of drinking vodka and mead, which makes the maidens readily accessible."

With hopes for a future rooted in the past,
I remain,

THE WITHERING OF THE SOVIET STATE

(or WHITHER THE SOVIET STATE?)

In preparation for the celebrations of the 60th anniversary of The Great October Socialist Revolution, one saw a feverish attempt by the Soviet bureaucracy in Moscow to create what it deemed an appropriate political scenario. The months, May and June of 1977, were particularly hectic and indicative of what L. Brezhnev, the first Secretary of the CPSU's has in store for Soviet society.

On May 24th, N. Podgorny (Pidhrny) when he acknowledges his Ukrainian origin, an original member of the triumvirate, which took power from N. Krushchev in 1964, and widely regarded as second only to Brezhnev in the power hierarchy of the Soviet elite, was ousted from the Politbureau of the Central Committee of the CPSU, and soon after was relieved of his duties as President or Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union. In the days immediately following these disclosures, there was extensive discussion in the west as to their significance for future developments accepted as an official head of state, comparable to d'Estaing of France, the Amerikan (sic) Presidents, British Prime Minister or his fellow CP leaders, such as Husak of Czechoslovakia, Zhikov of Bulgaria, Hovecker of East Germany, Ceausescu of Romania and Tito of Yugoslavia, who combined the party and state portfolios. Now the insipid but vain Brezhnev will benefit from the protocol honours of treaty signing, 21 gun salutes, etc., gestures accorded to a head of state.

At this point one can safely make a prognosis as to these conditions. The purging from power of bureaucrats considered to be Brezhnev's antagonists and their concomitant replacement by Brezhnev's toadies, Brezhnev's consolidation of both state and party power and the nuances of Brezhnev's draft constitution, all point to a revival or perhaps reinforcement of a Stalinist-type personality cult.

One sees in the history of the Soviet Union repeated attempts by its leaders to commission constitutions to their socialist democracy and violations of Leninist norms of party and state, etc. as characteristic of the Stalin regime, and indicated that these conventions of constitutional provisions were resolutely condemned by the party and promised that it should never be repeated.

In this same deceptive vein Brezhnev introduced, on September 1st, a new de-Stalinized national anthem, deleting the lines...Stalin has raised us to trust in the people inspiring us to labour and heroic deeds..., when in the same week J. Andropov, Brezhnev's confidant and head of the KGB was delivering a laudation for Felix Dzerzhinsky (the creator of the KGB and certainly no champion of democracy) on the occasion of the centenary of his birth.

On the question of the constitution, one of the most striking features is the description of the role of the state and party in Soviet society. Before entering into an analysis of these points it would be germane to the theme far-left currents and petty bourgeois forces, as to the demands of the workers, peasants, and soldiers, which in his opinion laid the foundations for degeneration, repression, bureaucracy, etc.

The epitome of the degree to which repression, centralism and inflexibility could be brought to, under the guise of socialism, was the dictatorship J. Stalin at the expense of the mediating energies of the Trotskyist and Borkininite oppositions.

All facets of social reality became permeated with Stalin's policies. Even the historical materialism of Marx and the science of dialectical materialism suffered under Stalin's odious influence.

As Herbert Marcuse delineates in Soviet Marxism Stalin codified the tenants of historical materialism and arranged them according to his revamped dialectics to suit his conceptions of reality and rationalize his policies. The state and party grew to awesome proportions under Stalin's jurisdiction.

On the question of human rights and the relationship of the individual to the state one finds the guaranteed freedoms of speech, press, assembly, demonstration, worship, criticism, etc., but now qualified so that exercise by citizens of rights and freedoms must not injure the interests of society and the State and rights of other citizens and that exercise of rights and freedoms shall be inseparable from the performance by citizens of their duties. The Catch-22 of the situation is obvious since it has long ago been proven that state and society often are euphemisms for the elite under the particular vozhd. The theoretical legitimacy that oppositionists in the past such as Plyushch, Dzyuba, Rudenko or Tykhyi may have officially had (albeit that this legitimacy was reneged by the courts) now is rendered impossible by these constitutional qualifications.

On the Nationalities question, the 15 republics are granted the usual secession rights and all sorts of autonomies, yet again the ments in the power structure of Soviet leadership. Comparatively more minor changes were the replacement of K. Katsushev by K. Rusakov as the USSR's representative to Comecon, and the elevating of K. Chernenko and V. Kuznetsov to alternate members in the Politbureau.

On May 27th, the Supreme Soviet approved a revised draft of the new Soviet constitution which was printed on June 4th and disseminated throughout the USSR.

In the new constitution, provision was made for a First Vice-President of the Union, a post which was immediately filled by V. Kuznetsov, the former First Deputy Foreign Minister.

Finally, on June 16th, Leonid Brezhnev appointed himself President, marking the first time in the history of the Soviet Union that one man, officially, led the party and state simultaneously. (Khrushchev and Stalin both occupied party leadership and the post of Premier). The Presidency of the Soviet Union, or the head of state function was not new to Brezhnev, as he occupied this position from 1960 to 1964 under Khrushchev.

This move though dramatic, can hardly be considered unpredictable. For over a decade Brezhnev the de facto ruler of the Soviet Union, has been frustrated by international protocol in not specifications. Lenin's constitution of 1918 was replaced by his successors with their version in 1924, which in turn was replaced by the Stalin constitution of 1936 (the latter ironically enough was actually written by K. Radek and N. Bukharin). Krushchev's proposed 1962 revision of the constitution (thwarted by his ousting soon after) and finally Brezhnev's constitution of 1977 all in turn reflect attempts by the respective writers/commissioners to immortalize themselves.

Caught between the pincers of external pressure due to detente/SALT negotiations, ostensible commitment to the Helsinki/Belgrade Charters, etc. and internal pressure due to the crises of economic stagnation and unproductivity, inability to satiate consumer demands, etc., the Soviet elite has feverishly attempted to portray a liberalizing and democratizing face, through it's propaganda on one hand, yet at the same time has ruthlessly smashed any attempts at the establishment of human and civil rights, cases of which are all too numerous documented and verified.

An indication of this hypocrisy is the case of Brezhnev's address during the ratification of the new constitution, where he cited illegal repressions, violations of the principles of

of this article to briefly recall several key debates on this very question in the historical development of the theoretics of socialism, so that this particularly enigmatic yet crucial question may be shown in its proper context as to its position in the Soviet Union today.

Over a hundred years ago in the forum of the First International M. Bakunin, in articles such as Statism and Anarchy etc., polemicised with K. Marx over what he considered to be inherent contradictions in the latter's concepts of workers' state and dictatorship of the proletariat coupled with their withering away.

For Bakunin, the praxis of such theory would inevitably lead to degeneration of any revolutionary gains and monopolization of power by elites insensitive to mass demands.

During the years preceding the February and October revolutions, Rosa Luxemburg scolded Lenin over the impossibility of creating revolution by decrees, and warned of what she saw in the Bolshevik tendencies to force ideological hegemony and attempt to conform the existant socialist reality to the former.

Alexander Berkman writing in The Russian Tragedy, etc., again scored the authoritarian and undemocratic tactics of the Bolsheviks in their relations with Soviet historical materialism now called for socialism in one country and by virtue of this socialist country being surrounded by capitalist imperialism the state could not wither away, but instead grow and monopolize power. Society was controlled by the state, which was controlled by the party, which was controlled by Stalin. Thus, ended the true dialectics of self-criticism and of progress. As distinction between the masses and the elite ossified, the fears and prognosis of libertarian socialist were realized, the revolution had unequivocably degenerated and been betrayed.

Despite the feeble attempts of Khrushchev and the rhetoric of Brezhnev to de-Stalinize or decentralize and democratize, one sees Stalinist social reality still pervading. The evidence can be in part seen in the new constitution.

In the 1936 constitution when describing the role of the party in the society, one simply finds reference to active and politically conscious citizens as members of the party which in turn is the vanguard of the working people.

No such modesty about the role of the party in relation to society exists in the new constitution, where for the Soviet Union or the State of the whole people the CP-SU in the feeding and guiding force of Soviet society and the nucleus of its political system, of all state and public organizations.

areas of the military and national defense, finance and budget and generally economic and social development are the jurisdiction of the All-Union apparatus.

In his speeches of the 1960's Khrushchev in claiming the imminent arrival of communism spoke of Soviet society on its way toward social self-administration, toward the final withering away of the state, passing through the intermediate stage of the transmission of the state functions to the trade unions and other organizations.

Similarly in the preamble to the 1977 Constitution, Brezhnev speaks of the Soviet Union as a developed socialist society yet empirical evidence rejects this claim, regardless of bombastic rhetoric and official ideology.

To truly de-Stalinize Soviet society one must affect its infrastructure or socio-economic and political reality.

The depreciation of economic and political democracy has resulted in a frustrated and anxious working class, an alienated intelligentsia, an inflexible production profile, a static growth potential and

BRIEFS ON THE USSR & EASTERN EUROPE

FROM INFORMATION BULLETIN (VOL.1, NO.1), PUBLISHED BY THE COMMITTEE IN DEFENSE OF SOVIET POLITICAL PRISONERS (EDMONTON)

UKRAINIAN PRISONERS HARASSED

According to a recent Smoloskyp bulletin, the KGB is carrying out a deliberate plan to increase strife and discord among certain prominent Ukrainian political prisoners and to discredit them in the eyes of their compatriots and western public opinion.

Several well-known political prisoners, among them Valentyn Moroz, Sviatoslav Keravansky, Danylo Shumuk, M. Osechky, Ivan Heli, and Rev. V. Romaniuk, have been isolated in Mordovian Camp 16, and have been allowed no visitors. After a year of harassment and attempts to set the political prisoners one against another, several of the political prisoners went on a partial hunger strike. After several months had gone by they determined that their previous nervous exhaustion and irritability had probably been due to the presence in their food and salt of small crystals of some unknown chemical substance. Thus, the political prisoners themselves established that certain letters written by Danylo Shumuk, falsified segments of which were printed in KGB publications directed at the Ukrainian emigre community, were written when he was under the influence of hallucinogenic chemicals and under strong psychological pressure from psychiatrists and psychologists.

Strong pressure is also being exerted on the families of political prisoners. It is expected that soon falsified letters from the children of certain political prisoners will be sent abroad in which other political prisoners will be slandered and accused of collaboration with the regime.

TERELIA JAILED AGAIN

Ukrainian dissident Yosyf Terelie, author of the widely-publicized letter to KGB chief Andropov in December 1976, has again been imprisoned. After he spent three and a half years in a psychiatric hospital in Sychorka (Dec. 1972 - April 1976), early June 1977 the Zekerpataha oblast court decided to send him back to the same hospital. His wife is being severely harassed in the town in which she lives.

CHARTER '77 ACTIVIST HARASSED

With the trials of the Charter '77 supporters beginning September this year, administrative harassment has increased against a leading member of the Charter '77 group. Petr Uhl, UH was a prominent activist in the Czech student movement in 1968. He was jailed as a Trotskyist in 1971. A document recently appeared in Labour Focus no. 5 in which Uhl discusses his recent arrest and his recent interrogation. Uhl has been repeatedly warned by police to end his activity in the Charter '77 movement. On October 18th, Frankfurter Rundschau reported that the prominent East German dissident, Wolf Biermann, the West German Marxist Rudi Deuschele, and Jakob Moneta, editor-in-chief of the newspaper of the large West German metallurgical union have written a letter in support of Petr Uhl, and also giving their unconditional support for the struggle for human rights in Eastern Europe.

WORKERS' DEMO IN NOVOCHERKASSK

A recent samizdat document gives details about a workers' demonstration which took place in Novocherkassk on June 2, 1962.

The demonstration followed a strike called by workers in the largest factory in the city to protest sharp increases in the price of meat and dairy products at the same time that wages were cut. It is estimated that approximately 150 workers and members of their families died when units of the Soviet armed forces opened fire on the demonstrators.

After the incident no information about the strike was allowed to leave the city, the families of those who were killed or wounded were exiled, and several trials took place. The document was signed by a number of prominent Soviet dissidents, including P. Grigorenko, A. Sakharov, V. Turchin, T. Khodorovich and T. Velikanova. They called for the date of June 2 to be commemorated as a day of remembrance for those who were killed in cold blood.

RUDENKO & TYKHY DEFENDED

In an open letter to participants in the Belgrade Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and to Amnesty International General P. Grigorenko appealed that they demand an immediate cessation of the physical and psychological torture endured by the Ukrainian poet Mykola Rudenko and his co-defendant Oleksa Tykhy, and their immediate release from prison. Mykola Rudenko, an invalid of World War II with spine damage, has been denied proper medical treatment, and strong pressure is being exerted on him to extract an "expression of remorse" from him.

DISSIDENTS LEAVE USSR

Three Soviet dissidents, Tatiana Khodorovich, Dina Kaminskaya and Mark Popovsky, have left the Soviet Union. They arrived in Vienna on November 6th. T. Khodorovich was a co-founder, in 1969, of the Initiative Group for the Defence of Human Rights, of which Leonid Plyushch was a member, and was very active in his defence after he was imprisoned. In recent months she had administered the Solzhenitsyn fund set up to aid political prisoners and their families in the Soviet Union. She launched an appeal to Western countries to help dissidents resist the formidable pressure exerted upon them by the Soviet regime.

AMNESTY A FARCE

A. Sakharov, the Nobel Peace prize winner, said that the KGB had prevented him from handing in a question during a special Kremlin meeting of the Soviet Academy of Sciences on November 15, 1977. In his question he had complained that a recent amnesty proclaimed to mark the sixtieth anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution, was restricted to certain categories of minor offenders. On the same day, 30 dissidents in Leningrad urged the Soviet government to release Anatoly Shcharansky, a leading dissident, from prison, and called for an inquiry into the interrogation methods used in his case. Shcharansky is a founding member of the Helsinki human rights group. He was arrested on March 15, 1977 and has been held for investigation at the Lefortovo prison in Moscow on capital treason charges. Many Soviet Jews wishing to emigrate to Israel have been interrogated in connection with the Shcharansky case.

GRIGORENKO IN USA

General P. Grigorenko, a major figure of the Soviet dissident movement, has been given permission to visit the US for six months to undergo an operation and to visit his son Andriy. Grigorenko's health has deteriorated considerably in the last year. He is an active member of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group, and is the Moscow representative of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group. Grigorenko hopes to return to the Soviet Union after his visit to the US.

ROMANIAN OUT FOR YEAR

Paul Goma, Romanian author and initiator of the letter of Romanian intellectuals to the Belgrade conference dealing with the infringement of human rights in Romania, has been allowed to leave Romania to visit France on a one year tourist visa. Born in 1945, Goma was first arrested in 1956 for publicly reading his work Doulaurs in which he condemned the Soviet invasion of Hungary. He was released in 1958. He joined the Communist Party in 1968 after Ceausescu's condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. He was sentenced to jail for two and a half months for his letter to the Belgrade Conference, and was freed in May 1977.

PLAKHOTNIUK RELEASED?

In May 1977 a medical commission recommended that the Ukrainian dissident Mykola Plakhotniuk be released from the special psychiatric hospital in which he is being held. No decision, however, has yet been taken on his case. If Plakhotniuk is released he may be faced with renewed charges of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" for the alleged actions for which he was arrested in 1972. The psychiatric commission which originally ruled that he was mentally ill ruled that he became "non-accountable" after his alleged "offence", which means that according to Soviet law he could still face trial and sentence for possession and distribution of samizdat literature.

Amnesty International is now launching a letter-writing campaign on his behalf.

POLISH ACTIVISTS FINED

On October 29, 1977, three Polish members of Amnesty International were fined 3000 zloty for collecting signatures in a public place without permission and creating a public disturbance. The three, Adam Wojciechowski, Emil Morgiewicz, and Zbigniew Sekola, all supporters of the Movement for the Defence of Human and Civil Rights in Poland were collecting signatures for a petition calling for the release of political prisoners all over the world.

CHARTER '77 TRIALS BEGIN

The trials of six arrested members of the Charter 77 human rights movement in Czechoslovakia have begun.

On October 17th, spokespersons for the Charter 77 movement issued an appeal in defence of Ales Machacek and Vladimir Lastuvka, both technicians from north Bohemia who were arrested in January, 1977, and charged with subversion of the Republic under Article 98, Section I of the Penal Code. Their trials were held in Usti-nad Labem on September 26-28th where they were sentenced both to three and a half years of imprisonment.

The case has aroused great indignation inside the country but has received little attention in the Western press. Unlike the trial of four other Charter 77 members - Lederer, Havel, Ornast and Pavlicek - it was not mentioned at the Human Rights Commission at Belgrade, although the sentences are harsher in the case of Machacek and Lastuvka as well as a clear violation of the Helsinki Final Act 192 of the International Covenant on Political and Civil Rights, which Czechoslovakia ratified.

The grounds for the indictment of Machacek and Lastuvka was the fact that Czech and Russian books and periodicals published in Toronto, Paris, Cologne and Rome were found in their possession. As one of the proofs of their "hostile" motivations in distributing the publications and towards the "socialism system" an essential requirement under Article 98, the court submitted that the defendants sympathized with Charter 77 and has refused to join the January campaign condemning Charter 77.

Machacek and Lastuvka's trials were closed. The regional court building at Usti-nad-Labem was guarded by 200 armed policemen and at least 50 plain-clothes police. The entire area was enclosed with barbed wire and surrounded by armoured cars. Only 8 people were allowed into the court room, six of whom were immediate relatives. Amongst those debarred from the trial were two representatives of the International Association of Lawyers in Vienna. On the last day of the trial, two other Chartists, Ivan Dejmal and Petr Uhl, were arrested and detained for 48 hours for attempting to enter the court room.

The second trial, which opened on October 17th and received much wider publicity in the Western press, held four defendants - Ota Ornest, film director, Jiri Lederer, journalist, Frantisek Pavlicek, ex-Communist Party Central Committee member, and Vaclav Havel, playwright. Ota Orneste received the highest sentence, three and a half years. Jiri Lederer received three years. Both Havel and Pavlicek received suspended sentences of 14 and 17 months respectively.

Ornest and Lederer were charged with subverting the Republic from 1973 to January, 1977 by maintaining conspiratorial links with the Czech emigres Pavel Tigrid and Jr Pelikan to whom they sent contributions for publications in their periodicals Svedectvi a Listy. Pavlicek was charged with an attempt to subvert the Republic (Article 98, Paragraph 7) by providing Lederer with an interview for his book A Book of Interviews in the Spring of 1976. Havel was charged for trying to "harm the interests of the Republic abroad by spreading false news" (Article 112, Paragraph 8) by passing on memoirs of the former minister of Justice, Prokop Drtilna to Lederer. Allegedly, Lederer passed these memoirs to a Canadian diplomat, William Bonthron.

Similar to the Machacek and Lastuvka trial, the trial of the four was closed to the public. About 150 people attempted to enter the court room. A visa was denied to the reporter from the French Communist daily L'Humanite who attempted to report on this trial. In a statement published in La Monde on October 18, the editor of Listy, Jiri Pelikan pointed out the reason why it was necessary for material to circulate clandestinely both within Czechoslovakia and across its borders was due to the fact that the regime suppressed free information within Czechoslovakia and promised to cease engaging in the clandestine circulation of Listy as soon as all interests can publish in the normal way".

CZECHOSLOVAKS ARRESTED

Jan Princ was arrested on July 9 in the region of Decin, after a farewell party given for the Canadian Paul Stein who was expelled from Czechoslovakia on July 15. Princ was sentenced to 3 months of imprisonment on September 21st for disturbing the peace (Article 6, Law 50/60). Due to protests and demonstrations on his behalf, Princ was released 17 days after the verdict. Both he and his wife have been unable to find any work.

D. Hubert Stein who was sentenced to 12 years imprisonment in the summer of 1977, was temporarily released in June 1976, and re-arrested in February, 1977. Stein is 73 years old and very ill. He remains at the Pankrac prison in Prague, sentenced for allegedly supplying information to the Dutch embassy in Prague.

Ivan Jiron, an art historian and leader of the Plastic People group was re-arrested in October at an opening of an art show in a Youth League Hall. He was arrested after referring to the Youth official as a "bourgeois cow" and was charged with disturbing the peace.

WHO ARE THE UKRAINIANS AND

I have been asked to speak on a rather large topic—the major developments in Ukraine in the last fifteen years, their effect upon the Diaspora, the regeneration of the left-wing and socialist tradition and the impact of Plyushch's most recent tour of North America. This is clearly too broad a topic to be dealt with adequately in 45 minutes. And I am not sure whether the Ukraine-Diaspora connection is all that should be investigated to determine where we stand today. Rather, political and social forces of greater international proportions shape the evolution of the Ukrainian question and our predicament as national minorities as much as this connection.

What is the main lesson we can draw from the Plyushch tour and how does it represent a new stage in the life of the Diaspora? An answer to this question also demands a framework broader than the traditional organic-national framework many are accustomed to. His release from the Dniproprostrovsk Psychiatric Hospital by a left wing campaign in France, in which few Ukrainians participated, should tell us that. Subsequent developments, right up to the recent tour demand explanations involving more than just Ukrainians, and certainly more than just Ukrainian nationalists. They are but one small factor in the international constellation of political pressures bearing on the Ukrainian question.

THE HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

By the end of the Second World War, we are dealing with a fairly complicated situation in Ukraine. When this War began, a large part of the population, particularly in the Western regions under Poland and the peasantry in Soviet Ukraine which had been brutally crushed in the 1930's by collectivisation, supported the German invasion. Soviet historians hide the fact that thousands of Red Army soldiers surrendered in the first few months of the War, hoping to see Stalinism replaced by a more democratic and equitable system. Before 1943 and the emergence of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA), the greater part of the nationalist movement supported the Nazis. Those who supported the Red Army and Soviet Partisan movement in the USSR were a small group until the defeat of the Germans at Stalingrad in February, 1943 and the Soviet offensive to the West.

But as the War front moved back across Soviet territories in 1943-44 the majority of the Ukrainian people, who had experienced the colonial boot of Nazi Germany in its most refined and brutal form, chose what they considered to be the lesser evil—the Stalinist system. At no time did there exist a third and revolutionary alternative, except in a limited, confused and ineffectual way the UPA in North Western Ukraine.

Stalin consolidated Western Ukraine was incorporated economically and politically in the space of the first post-War Five Year Plan. The rural areas were depopulated by deportations to Siberia, the Greek Catholic Church, a traditional mainstay of peasant life was forcibly united with the Russian Orthodox Church, already a servant of the Soviet state; the UPA was wiped out in the 1947 campaigns in Slovakia, Southern Poland and Western Ukraine. Returning Red Army prisoners of war were imprisoned on the charge of desertion. The whole Crimean Tatar nation was deported in 1944 on the false charge of wholesale collaboration with the Third Reich. In short, Stalin used the experience of the War to once again entrench the system of bureaucratic dictatorship that existed before 1939 under the cover of a victorious fight against fascism.

The emergence of the Ukrainian opposition in the last fifteen years is the product of essentially new conditions and a new generation that was relatively unscathed by the horrors of the War. We do not mean that these were non-Stalinist conditions—Malenkov, Krushchev, Brezhnev and Kosygin earned their positions in the purges of the thirties and are true heirs of Stalin. But Khrushchev, by denouncing the pest at the 20th Party Congress in 1956 was forced to relax political controls as token proof that the crimes of the past would not reappear. It was in this context that the regeneration of the creative intelligentsia and later, the political opposition, took place. Inasmuch as the USSR itself could not be avoided by Khrushchev, yet could not be tolerated beyond very narrow limits, the emergence of the opposition signalled the new crisis of the whole system.

But that context has to be drawn in much broader outlines. The German Insurrection of 1953, the Polish workers' revolt of 1956, 1960 and 1976, the Hungarian Revolution and the Czechoslovak crisis in 1968 all played an important part in the quickening pace of ferment in the Soviet Union, providing it with new ideas and identifiable allies in the movements throughout the East in the post-War period.

To this scenario we should add the deep social and economic processes at work after the War. In Ukraine there arose for the first time in our history a mass intelligentsia that was conscious of its national oppression. It came alive under the protective shadow of the Shelestivschyna. Equally important, the Ukrainian working class, now thoroughly cynical of the repeated promises made by Party Congresses of a better standard of living, is the major social class. It is a hereditary class without the advantages of social mobility once offered in the 1930's and 40's by a rapidly growing state and societal infrastructure. The 1970's and 80's will witness the emergence of this force as a political contestant, and will reshape the demands and entire character of the dissident movement as we know it.

...After the War, the nationalist emigration focussed its community on Soviet developments and was engaged with the Ukrainian communists in a bitter fight; in the 1960's and 70's the new socialist generation sought a new orientation towards the struggle of the opposition, challenging both Stalinist and Nationalist perspectives...

EMIGRE POLITICS

We tend either to separate the experience of the Diaspora from developments in Eastern Europe or to posit a mechanical connection between them. All too often, the Diaspora is abstracted from the processes to which it is subjected in the Western capitalist countries of settlement.

Successive economic and political problems in Eastern Europe, from the land hunger of the 1950's and 1960's, to the nationalist emigration to the growing Jewish exodus in the 1970's have led to the concentration of sizeable communities in North and South America, Europe and Australia. Being national minorities, these communities have experienced the economic and cultural predicament that faces all immigrants—superexploitation, low wages, cultural assimilation, chauvinism from national majorities. These communities, together with the 40 million in the USSR embody the historical experience of the Ukrainian nation. Ultimately, this experience of the Ukrainian people and its struggle against all forms of oppression must be evaluated in a truly international framework. This is what we mean when we criticise a perspective that ignores the predicament of Ukrainians as national minorities in large capitalist states (and is content to consider the Ukrainian question limited strictly to Eastern Europe) or that draws a mechanical connection between the communities here and the majority of our people there. If Ukrainians were united by some mystical substance and were oblivious to social-political conditions in all states and internationally.

Ukrainian communities in the West have always looked to the developments in the homeland and taken sides in all struggles there. At the turn of the century, Ukrainians socialists in Western Canada organized defence campaigns for worker and peasant activists fighting against the Polish state and the Austro-Hungarian Empire; after the Revolution, many Ukrainians supported the International Communist movement because the Soviet government was initially prepared to support Ukrainianisation, because the large landowners who had driven our people to emigrate had been expropriated. In the 1930's, the community split, one group staying with the communist movement, another breaking with it on the strength of the Stalinist evidence. After the War, the nationalist emigration focused its community on Soviet developments and was engaged with the Ukrainian communists in a bitter fight in the 1960's and 70's. The new socialist generation sought a new orientation towards the struggle of the opposition, challenging both Stalinist and nationalist perspectives.

But equally, every national minority has had to deal with its social and cultural predicament in the new countries of settlement. The strength of the Communist movement in Canada in the 1920's lay precisely in its willingness to defend the rights of these minorities, who, incidentally formed the overwhelming majority of the CP in this period. But it was not only the Communists, but the socialists, nationalists and various community institutions that were heavily committed to the defense of the Ukrainians from the assimilationist and repressive policies of the Canadian government against them, the Metis, the Native Peoples and all non-Anglo-Saxon minorities. We have come a long way since then, but it is questionable whether we understand better than did our ancestors how to fight for our rights. In most recent times, the movement for Multiculturalism has expressed this concern; but we are concluding that it has largely failed and has been co-opted by the government for its own 'Unity' ends. The November 15, 1978, election of the PQ should give us good cause to examine the cohesiveness and underlying assumptions of the original Multicultural philosophy.

SHESTYDESIATNYK

Up to the mid-sixties the opposition in Ukraine was drawn largely from the cultural and creative intelligentsia. These activists expressed their national and democratic aspirations in various artistic forms and discussion groups. The repressions in 1968 against them demanded that their challenge to the state and its policies become a political one. Increasingly political, samvydav, and various protests criticised state policies and challenged the official view that national oppression and inequality had been overcome. But for a few examples, this critique fell short of demanding a radical transformation of society or the separation of Ukraine from the Soviet Union. Rather it was in the advocacy of reforms and the appeal to the rule of law that these oppositionists saw an alternative to the existing regime. In our history, before the Revolution, one could not speak of any significant middle class in Ukraine that was not rapidly assimilated by the Russian culture of the urban centres. Those who survived the purges of the 1930's were fully integrated into 1972, the KGB attempted to crush this growing discussion and ferment, and especially the production and circulation of the Ukrainian Herald, through mass arrests. The movement was temporarily alienated, but not defeated. It had been far less prepared to make its actions public (today exemplified only by the Helsinki Monitoring Group in Kiev), and it seems that the oppositional movement considers it as necessary to re-evaluate its past politics and tactics as to become an active public opposition again. Its further evolution will depend not only on this discussion, but upon the rest of Ukrainians and East European societies as well. The test of validity for any of the ideas and programmes of the opposition can only be made by those whose aspirations these programmes claim to represent—the workers, the peasants and the intelligentsia. We have yet to witness this kind of mass participation in political protest in Ukraine.

THE EAST—WEST CONNECTION

I mentioned at the outset that the oppositional struggle in Ukraine has been paralleled by a profound social process—the first mass Ukrainian intelligentsia in scious intelligentsia, sons and daughters of workers' and peasant families, not so readily and rapidly made into executors of Great Russian cheuvnists in Ukraine.

There is a parallel process in Canada, albeit under different circumstances. Pre-War emigrations settled on the land or became miners, railway workers and manual labourers. In the large cities, Ukrainians were part of the lowest stratum of the working population in the worst paid and worst condition jobs. The post-War period witnessed a rapid depopulation of the rural areas in Canada and a concurrent immigration of refugees from Germany to the large Canadian urban centres. The first born of these migrations, one internal to Canada, the other from Europe, reached university age in the late 1960's in a period of great expansions in the educational system. Although the overburdened English communities in Canada remained underrepresented in the university student population this generation nevertheless represented an important change in the social structure of the communities. To a lesser extent, this holds true for Ukrainian communities in Germany, France and Britain; to an equal degree it is true for the American Ukrainian community.

The first post-War Ukrainian emigration, Hungarians and a few exceptions, represented a generation that had been born in the Csepel hills, the Olystyn region, conference [redacted] clases within the population, (not only Ukrainians, but Jews, Russians and Poles). But the post-War period, and particularly the combination of the last stage of Industrialisation, urbanisation and the Shelestivshchyna could not fail to produce a nationally dity for any of the ideas and the opposition can only be made aspirations these programmes — the workers, the peasants of tsia. We have yet to witness mass participation in political conscious intelligentsia, sons and daughters of workers' and peasant families, so readily and rapidly made into executors of Great Russian chauvinist policies in Ukraine.

There is a parallel process in Canada, albeit under different circumstances. Post-War emigres settled on the land or became miners, railway workers and manual labourers. In the large Ukrainian-Canadian community's largest crop of professionals and intellectuals, you represent the maturation of the social structure of the Ukrainian people as a whole. As such, you are faced with a choice that the 'intellectuals' of all oppressed nations must resolve. You are members of an oppressed nation and a minority in this country, yet you have the qualifications for mobility that your parents could never have had. Your class instincts tell you to serve your community; your education allows you to leave it and to serve others.

It is under the influence of all of these processes described the historical, social, political and international—that the Ukrainian question evolves today. The left-wing current in the Diaspora, which many have tried to explain as a devious plot, a group misguided by 'enemies in our midst', should be seen in the light of these processes as well. Ukrainian socialists are organising today because they Ukrainian struggle in the Diaspora and in Eastern Europe.

AND PLYUSHCH?

And finally on the Plyushch tour. When Plyushch was released, many people realised that Ukrainians have no monopoly on the oppositional question; indeed it was largely due to the French socialist public that he got out. His press conferences in Europe (to a lesser extent in North America) have had a tremendous effect in educating this public about the nature of the Soviet opposition and the importance of the national question. Within the nationalist community, Plyushch was supported most by the democratic and left-wing forces and by ordinary working people. He was opposed most by the QUN-B leadership in this community and the Communist Party in the Ukrainian CP community.

Within the nationalist community, Plyushch was supported most by the democratic and left-wing forces and by ordinary working people. He was opposed most by the QUN-B leadership in this community and the Communist Party in the Ukrainian CP community.

Inevitably there arose tensions between those who have every intention to give the community an opportunity to meet Plyushch and those who consider his Marxist convictions a negation of their nationalist heritage and the picture they have painted of the opposition in Ukraine. During his first tour of North America these tensions were muted; during the second, a boycott was organized by the QUN-B in an attempt to deny Plyushch the opportunity to meet the community. In Chicago, letters were circulated urging people not to attend the rallies; in Edmonton the lease on a hall where he was to appear was withdrawn.

drawn; in Winnipeg the nationalists organized intensive pressure to have Plyushch barred from speaking at the Congress of the Ukrainian Canadian Committee. But this boycott failed because the community accepted Plyushch as a legitimate spokesman of the opposition in Ukraine and came to his meetings in large numbers. The organizers of the tour were successful, not only in providing the oppositional movement in Ukraine with a public platform before North American society, but also in demonstrating in practice what they mean by the democratisation of the community. They also put forward a defense of Soviet political prisoners that is progressive and consistently democratic, and that is a credible alternative to the anti-communist prejudices of the traditional 'defenders' in North America.

THE DEBATE BEGINS

But the debate in the Ukrainian community is focused on the multiculturalism question as well. The fight for multiculturalism was pioneered by Ukrainian students who were prepared to take the issue of cultural oppression and assimilation to the public. This was practical hard work which won many supporters in different ethnic communities and eventually a government policy. But the policy is of dubious value as many have seen since 1971. The first weakness seen in the multiculturalism concept is its failure to deal with those problems that are most pressing for new immigrants—racism, the worst social and working conditions, etc. It had no social content. Since the election of the PQ in Quebec, multiculturalism has suddenly acquired a new value for the government—it capsulises the myth that all cultures in Canada are equal and that Quebec has no interests in separation.

It was heartening to see the first issue of STUDENT out of Edmonton because its editors and co-workers are serious about dealing with this question politically. They not only ask what we mean by Multiculturalism ideally, but also who profits from government multiculturalism policy, why it has not satisfied communities' needs and what relevance it has to the Quebec question. This is certainly a debate that must be stimulated in the Ukrainian community (both the nationalist and communist) and between ourselves and the Quebecois, the Native Peoples and all minorities most oppressed in this country.

I think that the starting point of the debate within the Ukrainian community is the fight to win support for Quebec's right to self-determination and independence. The Communist Party and the nationalist leadership have registered pro-federalist positions. The Vancouver SUSK Congress passed a resolution supporting Quebec's rights. We should carry this resolution into practical work—discussions, meetings, communication between the Quebec student movement and our own, etc.

I am not suggesting that all of the practical work we are engaged in should halt to make room for such a discussion as events like the Plyushch tour and the Quebec-Multiculturalism controversy churn up. But any practical work must be guided by continuous discussion, continuous evaluation and self-criticism.

Given the scattered nature of democratic and left-wing groups in our community today, I think that the discussion should also envisage the possibility of arriving at a unitary organization in the not too distant future. The organizational question has bothered us for some time now and we should take the opportunities offered today to begin solving it. The following questions would be worthy of serious discussion amongst us:

1. What is our attitude to the Helsinki Accords? What importance do they hold for the Soviet bureaucracy, the American government, the oppositionists and the defense committees in the West?

2. How can we give more attention to the national and social questions in Ukraine in our defense work? Do we expect to be defending mass struggles in Eastern Europe in the near future as well as individual victims of repression and democratic rights?

3. An International unification and co-ordination of defense work.

4. What is our attitude to the Ukrainian CP community? How do we challenge the Canadian Tribune's slanders against the oppositionists, at the same time taking our defense work in to that community?

5. The failure of the first Multicultural action. An examination of its philosophy, the government's use of the issue and the reasons why it fails to answer the community's cultural needs; the social content of cultural oppression in Canada. Multiculturalism-Quebec; Multiculturalism-Native Peoples; Racism and unemployment in new immigrant communities.

6. The democratisation of the Ukrainian community. The failure of liberalism in KYK, CKVU, etc. Liga Vyzvolenia Ukrayiny and the Plyushch tour.

7. An organizational strategy for democratic and left-wing groups in the community.

have an alternative to the traditional leaderships of the community to offer on the most pressing problems facing our people. But the new socialist movement cannot be built solely on the basis of Ukrainian traditions. If it were, it could only turn to the 1920's in Ukraine and to Penas Fedenko's Ukrainian Socialist Party in the Diaspora. As much as the 20's was an immensely rich experience in ideas and struggle, it alone cannot provide perspectives for today. As much as Penas Fedenko's party calls itself socialist, it has tried more to maintain an old social democratic tradition alive than to create a new one for the contemporary situation. We socialists grew up in the radicalisation of the 1960's and came to our conclusions through the experiences of the Vietnam War, Quebec in the 1970's, Czechoslovakia in 1968, the Soviet opposition and the Polish workers struggle in 1971 and 1976. While we are most active in the Ukrainian community, we do not intend to sink into the mire of parochialism and provincialism. This attitude towards Canadian and world politics has as its net result corollary the participation of Ukrainian radicals in all popular movements, wherever they take place and the introduction of these popular movements to the

William Kurelek, the well-known Ukrainian-Canadian artist, died on November 3, 1977. Although in recent years he had become a very popular painter, and his works had become "status symbols" for many, Kurelek was a quiet and modest person with few pretensions. He had very interesting and original views on art, and his autobiography, Someone With Me, which has been used as an undergraduate psychology text at some universities, is a very sincere portrayal of a fascinating artist and person.

W. Kurelek had a great deal of pride in his Ukrainian background, and many of his paintings deal with the life of Ukrainians in Canada. It is unfortunate that, despite his great desire to visit his father's native village in Ukraine for several weeks to prepare drawings for a Ukrainian-Canadian epic in the form of a mural, he was allowed to do so only shortly before his death.

Below are excerpts from a presentation made to the Canadian Ethnic Studies Association (CESA) in 1973, entitled Development of Ethnic Consciousness in a Canadian Painter, which we are reprinting in lieu of a eulogy. The full text appears in Identities, a collection of the papers presented at the CESA Conference, published by Peter Martin Associates. The excerpts appear with the kind permission of the publisher.

I first became conscious of being "ethnic" and of being an "artist" at the age of seven. Those of you who may have already read my autobiography know the two incidents to which I am referring, but I will cite them for those who don't. In the first, I found out the hard way that Ukrainian was not to be spoken in public:

It was about the second day of school. As I sat in my little grade one desk I spotted a fly on the window. "Mookha, mookha!" I exclaimed pointing to it. It was probably the first fly of the season. John even got up to catch it. The teacher stood icily, and the classroom roared with laughter as we sank rad-faced back into our seats.

The second had to do with my scholastic rivalry with a boy in my grade in the first years of public school:

The two of us were standing by the school. "I bet I can draw a better train than you!" I said. "I bet you can't, I can," he shot back. So I went and drew our respective trains. I don't really recall what the drawings were like, or if in fact mine was better. The important thing was that I realized that I could draw. I also soon realized that this talent drew attention and admiration, and I was starved for both.

However at that stage these two aspirations were still two separate entities. They did come together for a few years in my late teens and early twenties but perhaps again for a good ten to fifteen years before totally new circumstances allowed a reunion. And this time I think it is a permanent one...

I went through the public school years wondering whether I was Ukrainian or English Canadian until I went to my brother and me to high school in Winnipeg. He also sent us to evening schools, one of which was a Ukrainian class. There I fell under the influence of Father Mayawsky, a tschach and dedicated Ukrainian nationalist. When I say "fall", I mean just that. At least I had found someone who was a man, a teacher and a Ukrainian, and I considered him a teacher figura. He taught us the history of the Ukraine, with its brief moments of glory followed by centuries of suffering under various foreign occupying powers. I was at last clear in my mind (or so it seemed to me) that I was a Ukrainian, not a Canadian. I dreamed of doing great things for the cause of Ukrainian liberation, and I idealized the Ukrainian countryside, people and culture, although I had never been there. I couldn't of course visit the Ukraine even if I'd had the wherewithal because the Iron Curtain was shut good and tight...

...to sellify my teacher and to insure his financial support for my education, I played along with his worldly ambition for prestige and security. I said I'd be a teacher, and I actually meant it at first. But the university turned me into a rebel. I fell under the influence of several books we studied and that I read myself: Joyce's Po- lre of the Artist as a Young Man, Butler's The Way of All Flesh and Stora's Lust For Life. All of these are ethiastic. Myself had indeed ridiculed religion, and I wasn't sure what I believed. But Father M.'s influence had made me give it a try. The book's influence proved stronger. That meant that Father M.'s nationalistic influence was waning. Having lost respect for official religion of which he was a representative, I could come no closer to him and in fact fled to avoid him. Secondly, it meant rebellion against family loyalties (and the family was Ukrainian) and turning instead toward self-discovery and development. Finally, despite the good influence of contacts with displaced persons who were coming over in large numbers and telling the truth about Soviet society, I came under the counter influence of leftist rebels. I simply had no lag to stand on in political discussions with them at the university and at art school.

It is true that in my wanderings across western Canada, Mexico and Europe I would return to Ukrainian subject matter from time to time. Sometimes one might even say that my art was nationalistic as is, for example, a large painting illustrating Gogol's Tsars Bulba. But primarily my emphasis was on "social consciousness"—that is, the solid virtues of working people and peasants. Eventually I ended up in a psychiatric hospital in England and my days as an "ethnic artist" seemed to be over.

The English peoples' gallantries, kindness, tolerance and hospitality to me in a time of need prompted me to settle and remain in England. I threw over the influence of my father's prejudices, not knowing that he was mellowing back home and making English friends at last.

And then came the big turning point in my life, my conversion to the Christian faith. It is because of this conversion that I am today an ethnic artist and writing a paper on the subject. I had reached such a low point that I was finished no matter how you looked at me, as a Canadian, a Ukrainian, an artist or even just a human being. The irony from the point of view of this paper is that I was pulled back from the brink of suicide by an Anglo-Saxon Margaret Smith. She helped me be practicing her Catholic Christian faith and by settling a good example. To me, being a genuinely religious person is inextricably tied in with being an ethnic artist. I'll explain this by showing the series of steps by which I came full circle back to ethnic art. And this time I became an ethnic artist now morally in conviction, but in actual practice. It started out with getting rock-bottom answers to rock-bottom questions.

STUDENT INTERVIEW

CONVERSATION WITH A FILMMAKER

Harvey Spek is a filmmaker.

Although "A lot of people my age were born at home", Harvey was born in August of 1941 in the Vegreville hospital. One remembers that some of the communities in the Ukrainian belt northeast of Edmonton didn't even have power until the mid-1950s or late forties. His mother was born just east of Mundare on a homestead; his mother is from Wostok, thirty miles to the north. Harvey grew up in Two Hills Alberta, yet another Ukrainian settlement in that colony that stretches north and east of the capital of the New Arab. His grandparents on both sides of his family were part of the first wave of immigrants that settled Canada at the turn of the century. They were Galicians, Catholics, and from around the region of Kolomyia.

I was surprised to discover that Harvey had a "strange history". In that he had studied for the priesthood (in the Latin church), as he put it, "a long time ago. I had six years in a seminary—in fact, I was just about almost ordained when I was asked to leave." Remembering those years, he chuckles in an affectionate and unambivalent way. Does he still consider himself a religious? He explained: "After that episode in the seminary I sort of stopped going to church for a long time; I never really stopped being a Catholic—I never became an apostate or anything. I just got tired of the whole shabang affair being with it for so many years."

Forced to abandon his pastoral inclination, he found work in Edmonton as a social worker, which he didn't enjoy. The following year he wanted to Montreal and enrolled in Communication Arts at Loyola, where the lifestyle of the sixties caught up with him. He had learned how to speak French in the seminary, and although he majored in photography his real interest was film.

"How I got into photography is an interesting story. The guy who taught photography at Loyola was Ukrainian—he name was John Max. That was his pen name, his real name was Ivan Pochekta. His teacher was a Ukrainian immigrant to Montreal... He became a very important photographer in Eastern Canada. We started talking one time and he asked me where I was from and I said Western Canada, from Alberta, and he said 'oh, there are a lot of Ukrainians in Alberta,' and I said 'yeah, I'm one of them.' He said 'so am I' so we started talking Ukrainian for a bit. I used to go to the house."

He started in film was modest: "I had this friend who was a priest in St. Albert. Thara used to be a retreat-house there and I used to go and help him out. He decided he'd do these multi-media shows for kid's retreats and wanted me to give him a hand, so I'd do some postare for him, get 2-3 projectors, and some slides, and do all these sort of primitive multi-media things. I became interested in film through that— we used to get in a lot of films from the National Film Board. Then I went to Loyola and found out I had to start in the 8 mm. film class. I did that for the first year."

In the second year he had his introduction into 16 mm. film, working as a cameraman, recording Allan Ginsberg's poetry readings and visits to Montreal. The film was never finished—"there just wasn't time" — and the footage he shot now collects dust in a corner somewhere in the National Film Board library.

The summer prior to that, he got a job making a film by himself—"I was the cameramen, director, sound men and editor"—on the Blood Indian Reserve in southern Alberta. He remarked without apology: "in a way it was a bad film; but in a way it was a good film. That was the first time I worked in 16 mm."

He moved back to Edmonton in 1970, and got involved with a group of filmmakers who eventually coagulated in a nabolous organization known as Filmwest. Comprised of 114 people, Filmwest drifts in and out of existence whenever money is available to shoot a film. He means philosophically: "It seems to run in cycles. One thing about Filmwest, though, is that we have absolutely no debts. Because when times are hard, we just don't pay ourselves. We've been surviving that way for five years." The approach is "populist" as opposed to "commercial", but Harvey concedes we do films for anyone who will pay us to do them— we're really very mercenary deep down." Another burst of laughter.

Duties for each assignment are rotated—on a film you're the director, the next film you're a cameraman. The idea is to keep everyone in touch with all aspects of the craft, and to counteract any latent pull to a Hollywood mentality. This approach is in part responsible for a distinct style that Harvey feels has emerged from the Filmwest group.

Spek elaborated on what he means by a distinct style and illustrated his explanation with a scene from his most recent film, a chame portrait of poet Andy Suknaski, funded by the National Filmboard. Finding inspiration in some ghostly memories from Suknaski's past, he had Andy hang himself in the Winnipeg stockyard, exclaiming, "that's a fantastic prelude image!" He concluded with a question: "How do you kill yourself on the prairies. Two ways: you shoot yourself with a 22 or else you hang yourself with some barbed wire or some fencing wire... Wa dramatized it. Why not?"

CLUB NEWS

CROSS CANADA

CALGARY

The Calgary club informs its fellow clubs and members through its newsletter of a recently held Halloween party at which all those who attended and participated, enjoyed themselves immensely.

Highlight of the evening was a best costume contest won by Richard Latimer by his portrayal of the Great Pumpkin.

M. Gottsellig, Tom Neil, Susan Birley and Roxy Kozak all won prizes for their portrayals of a swashbuckler, and woodnymphs respectively.

The winner of the ski trip to Big White B.C. was Earl Hjeller.

Unfortunately the turnout for the party was less than anticipated and consequently a substantial amount of money was lost.

Hopefully in the future greater attendance will allow the continuation of such events.

A Christmas party, carolling in December and further events in January are planned. All are encouraged to attend and any enquiries ought to be directed to 318 E MacEwan Hall, U of C, Calgary.

OTTAWA

The Ottawa Ukrainian Students' Club recently held its general meeting/social where club members formed various committees to plan events for the upcoming year.

Already underway are preparations for a skating and a cross-country ski-trip in December, and January, respectively, coffeehouses, seminars, films, etc., and a regular newsletter.

Club members are also involved in organizing a radio program for the Ukrainian community.

The club has managed to acquire access to a house on weekends in which it will base its activities. Its initiating function will be an evening featuring a Ukrainian Gong Show and local musicians.

The ambitious and well organized Ottawa club appears to be well upon its way of preparing itself and the community for an interesting and enjoyable year.

VANCOUVER

With the Congress being held in Vancouver this year, the club started off with much enthusiasm. Membership remained approximately the same as last year. At Clubs' Day on campus, Alpha-Omega set up a booth to recruit new members. With the new executive's ideas and enthusiasm the club should look forward to another great year.

October was a busy month for the club with a lasagna dinner and dancing one night. A good turnout made the evening a success. With the approach of Halloween, everyone was looking forward to the annual car rally. This event is put on with the Ukrainian Athletic Association. Because of Halloween, everyone was in costume and this certainly added to the success of the event. A party was held after the rally. Some of the things the club members are looking forward to in the coming months are more dinners, and, of course, the big project is the ski trip with the University of Calgary Club. Plans are being made for a good time. Also, with spring slowly creeping up on us, the executive has started making plans for the annual graduation banquet.

With this year well underway the executive feels that with the cooperation and enthusiasm of all members we should go a long way. If the past few weeks are any indication, the rest of the year looks promising.

FINANCIAL CONFERENCE

SUSK has been in poor financial shape, and in fact has been saddled with a considerable debt, for the last several years. Concrete measures to settle the problem were taken during 1976 when the Congress in Toronto resolved that SUSK restrict its financial expenditures as much as possible, and that a determined effort be made to pay off the existing debt. Although some progress was made in 1976-77, much of the debt still remains, imposing a considerable financial and psychological "brake" on SUSK's work.

The present executive has continued a policy of fiscal restraint, although it has had some difficulty in working effectively on its restricted budget. Nonetheless, a regular Ukrainian student newspaper is being published, and some important and concrete steps have been taken in the areas of multiculturalism and human rights. No projects are being undertaken which would run a risk of increasing the present debt.

It is disturbing, however, that a number of "new" debts from the past have surfaced recently. People have come forward with old claims, in some cases dating back a number of years, which, for some reason, previous executives had not passed onto their successors. (SUSK's record in the area of finances has not been outstanding). Unless SUSK is bestowed a major financial windfall it cannot now hope to pay off all the debts it faces. However, the executive feels that it is necessary to clear the air and to eliminate the misunderstandings which have plagued the financial side of SUSK's work. To this end we are requesting that individuals or organizations who still have old financial claims on SUSK (other than those mentioned in the financial report presented to the last congress) come forward (or forever hold their peace). Due to the wide circulation of STUDENT we hope that most of those to whom SUSK owes money will respond.

A financial conference will be held in February in Toronto at which all debts will be reviewed and some strategy formulated to cope with them. Hopefully, it will be possible to order these debts and deal with them in a consistent fashion. At the very least, it is hoped that SUSK's financial situation will be clarified, and that some guidelines can be drawn up to help regulate SUSK's financial activities in the future.

Please address any correspondence you may have concerning SUSK financial affairs either to the SUSK National office 11246 - 91 St., Edmonton, Alberta, T5B 4A2, or to the Toronto regional office, 191 Lippincott St., Toronto, Ontario, M5S 2P3. There will be more details about the upcoming financial conference in the next issue of STUDENT.

CAROLLING

Every year it is a tradition of Ukrainian Students' Clubs to go carolling during the Christmas season. In addition to bringing Christmas greetings from the Ukrainian students to the Ukrainian community at large, Koliada serves as a major fund-raising event. We hope that those of our readers who are visited by carollers will greet them generously. All donations will help support worthwhile student activities at the local level and the work of SUSK at the national level in the areas of multiculturalism, human rights and coordination of Ukrainian student activities across Canada.

If student carollers are unable to visit you, please consider sending in a donation to the SUSK National Executive, 11246-91 St., Edmonton, Alberta, T5B 4A2.

Ukrainian "bourgeois nationalist organizations." [Excerpts are reprinted here not out of any political motives — Ed.] The article gives an account of Ukrainian nationalist organizations' activities which:

is marked with bloody stains of service rendered to almost every foreign secret agency. and gives a "chronicle of the nationalists' atrocities" during the German occupation of Ukraine, where they assisted their masters (German Gestapo) in exterminating about two million civilians.

Klymchuk Sr.'s motives for "volunteer[ing] to serve the fascists faithfully" was "to save his land and the wealth gained from people's grief" [Klymchuk Sr.'s father, held some 26 acres of land — Ed.] The article states that the atrocities of these organizations were even greater and more "inventive" than those of the Nazis, who threw children onto the corpses and tortured adults to lie on them and than shot those lying there." As examples of this "blood-thirsty mafia" of these nationalists which far outweighed the Nazi exterminations the article cites numerous examples of villagers being sliced into pieces, etc., etc. It was thanks to the "mighty blows of the Soviet Army" that the Ukraine was "liberated from the terror, plunder and violence, and brutal vengeance imposed by the nationalists." The article concludes:

History prepared for the Ukrainian bourgeois nationalists the fate they deserve — to continue rotting on the garbage heaps of history. Neglecting no means and methods, the worst lackeys of imperialism...are ready to sell themselves to one and all and to do any kind of dirty work for miserable pay. The offspring of the Klymchuk family, for example, undertook such a job but failed disgracefully.

WHY KLYMCHUK?

The article is reminiscent of Soviet attacks on opposition groups and individuals continuously employed since the 1930's. The fact that the same campaign against "bourgeois nationalists" exists today is only an indication that internal opposition to the regime continues, and that the regime lacks "inventiveness" in dealing with these currents. After 60 years of "socialism", the bureaucracy would be hard pressed to explain the existence of "bourgeois nationalist organizations" in Ukraine. Tharafra, the Klymchuk case.

The Klymchuk case has also given rise to the question — why emigre nationalist organizations and defense committees have not taken up the defense of Klymchuk? Recently, the president of the NUS in Britain, Su Slipman, who is also a member of the British Communist Party appealed to Brezhnev in defense of Klymchuk. At a time when a broad sector of the left is campaigning for his release, the nationalist organizations are silent, while socialists defend the son of a nationalist.

SOVIET

generally economic sanity. After 60 years of growth the Soviet Union is far from the socialist maturity as Brezhnev and his toadies falsely claim, but rather, as in the terminology of Ernest Fischer, is suffering from angst, the angst of material and spiritual bankruptcy. A rather succinct categorization of the Soviet Union today, circulating in Samvydav, is depicting it as at the stage of economic menopause, in so far as fertility development of Soviet society, increased growth, advance in technology and industry, ability to divert resources to consumer good production is presently impossible due to Moving to a more general discussion of art, we touched upon the role of traditions "If you're going to be an artist of any kind and speak for people — for other human beings — you have to be aware of where you come from. You have to be aware of that backlog ... that subconscious instinct you have somaplace behind you. And the more you get to understand that, the more you get to understand yourself. And the more interesting it becomes." Which brought to mind a comment that Hervey had made earlier in our discussion: "To discover that there was a tradition of filmmaking in Russia and Ukraine — for 40-50 years — that they in fact had been making films before Hollywood and had pioneered techniques that were copied by the Americans — that to me was really a revelation."

Although he hasn't had the opportunity to see any of Dovchenko's films, Hervey has read The Poet as Filmmaker and seen many of Eisenstein's films. Another remark he made early in our conversation helped put what he was saying in perspective: "There was a time I think when I didn't want to be Ukrainian anymore, after I got out of high school. I didn't want to speak Ukrainian, I even wanted to change my name. It took a little while to sort of try to understand him in a phrase: "The seminarian-filmmaker," or "the gentle rebel of Two Hills" — but somehow it doesn't work. If you want to know the real Hervey Spek you'll have to meet him yourself."

my acceptance of the commission I was only one or two steps away from total awareness of the ethnic role that had been cut out for me.

The four women gave me more support as my research-interviews, photographs and a three-week trip to western museums and the actual painting progressed. Unfortunately they failed to communicate their vision and enthusiasm to the rank-and-file members of their group and so they bought only one-third of the series. This didn't bother me because, with Av Isaacs' salesmanship, it was a sellout event.

After my fifth show the Ukrainian community began to buy in earnest. As it confirmed Isaacs' evaluation of the community's progression of values, the greater number of those who bought proved to be non-Canadians. They had arrived after the last war practically destitute. Yet in an amazingly few years they had acquired money. Since most had educated and cultured backgrounds in the Ukraine, they spent a considerable portion of their wealth on art. I bring up the matter of petroglyphs because I follow the rather simple view of art held in the Middle Ages, that art is not something esoteric and ascetic, but a craft and a commodity. As a craftsman the artist produced what he was commissioned to do or what was sensible for that was his livelihood. Like the medieval artist, I rely on, and try to satisfy my customers in subject matter, size and medium. The result is that since I now have a large number of Ukrainian buyers who often buy Ukrainian themes, I automatically find myself producing ethnic art. It's as simple as that...

...they [Mykole and Olga Kollanikwsky] led a cultural group tour of the Ukraine, and I went along. This visit helped me to answer the question I'd put to myself some twenty-five years earlier: "Am I Ukrainian or Cenedien?" In my case the answer was not to be found in the cities where the Soviet authorities led us to see the showpieces of Ukrainian Art. If you in the small villages...

Fortunately, with the help of the Kollanikwsky, I obtained permission to visit my father's village. Although this visit lasted a mere four hours, I felt that it was well worth putting up with the annual of the three-week-long conducted tour. In those four hours I saw, however fleetingly, the houses in which the peasants lived, ate the food they ate, photographed the village pond and talked the language of my forebears. It was like living a lifetime in one day. Here were my ultimate roots. For these hard-working, simple (you might almost say naive) people reminded me so much of the Ukrainian farm people I knew in Alberta. This was the real Ukraine, not the attenuated vision I had worshipped in my nationalist days in Winnipeg. And it excited me as Van Gogh's Potato Eaters excited me but Van Dyck's portraits do not...

...as my fame spread I observed that the Ukrainian community came into our home more than ever before. They came to buy, to get advice, to invite me to address their organizations or simply to talk. I found that the more I talked about culture, the more I came to love it. Some of my happiest moments were, and still are spent listening to Ukrainian music as I paint. I was getting closer to my heritage and further from my wife and family for the simple reason that they did not share my interest in the Ukrainian heritage — I mean an interest that would spontaneously draw them to it, to taste and be nourished by it.

In a strange way my disappointment has helped me. I have become more keenly aware of the differences between the two cultures and better able to represent that difference in my painting. Secondly, I have become more sympathetic with the emigre Ukrainians' concern over the Russification of his motherland. Finally, my experience has helped me to appreciate how fortunate I and other people of various origins are to be living in Canada. Although we cannot always share our heritage, we can at least express it in freedom.

This then is the story of one man's odyssey toward ethnic awareness...each reader is free to extract his or her own set of conclusions, but I venture to offer my own conclusions in the hope that self-analysis may be of value.

1. Ethnicity cannot be manufactured any more than morality can be legislated. It is there by birth or experience and can only be uncovered or nurtured.

2. I would advise the ethnic artist not to feel sorry for himself and not to wall until his people have organized to give him practical assistance. If help is offered, accept it and be grateful and use the assistance honestly. If not, go to the government or any ethnic or public-spirited groups willing and interested in helping.

3. There is no longer any excuse for anyone in this country to be ashamed of his cultural background. Canada has a multicultural society. The days of Anglo-Saxon domination are gone, or nearly gone. The English have their own virtues and culture. We must not forget those virtues, for in the days of that domination they gave our ethnic culture at least a breathing chance.

4. harbouring bitterness toward individuals or groups who deny you development or expression is a mistake. Bitterness poisons the soul and does little, if any hurt to the oppressor. If at all possible, go somewhere where you do have opportunity for development and do your thing for your people there.

5. Art is not the most important thing in the world, neither are race or nationality. Human beings — individual human souls — are the most important. The prima activity of each individual, whether he is talented or ordinary is saving his soul and helping others save theirs. The reason is alimentary: we have only a few short years here, but eternally in the next life.

6. Put God first and your nationality or ethnic origin second. If you really practice this priority, He will be more than generous in helping you in your work for your people.

7. Give love and angry towards some work for the whole family of men, whether it be for individuals or less fortunate groups.

8. Just as it is wise to know yourself and to face up to your own weaknesses, so it is also wise to recognize the deplorable faults of your race. But don't dwell on those weaknesses; it is better to work at eradicating them. As for the opposite mistake — worshipping or distributing ideal qualities to your race or country — it should be fairly obvious that no such ideal people exist!
